MORE than 80 per cent of young Scots are "unsuitable for any employment", according to one of the country's biggest firms.

A culture of "wholly unrealistic expectations" towards the modern workplace – including shock at the hours they are expected to put in – lies behind the decline, the training arm of motoring giant Arnold Clark has told MSPs.

A major summit is to be staged by Holyrood's finance committee tomorrow that will see politicians and businesses join forces to try to improve the "employability" of the emerging Scottish workforce.

Exactly so...a lack of the work ethic.

As a matter of interest, since it is Arnold Clark that made the comment, I see an ad in the paper:

a two-year apprenticeship with one of the largest Car Servicing and Repair Company in the UK. The programme will teach you about every area of the business and the two full years of training will lead to a NVQ qualification and a career as a Car Mechanic/Fitter. Training courses will focus on the following products: Tyres, Battery and Charging Systems, Exhausts, Engine Technology, Cutting and Welding, Steering and Suspension, Wheel Alignment, Air Conditioning, Glass Repair and Brakes
